

A man with grey hair, wearing a tan sweater over a white collared shirt and dark trousers, is sitting on a white hospital exam table. He is looking towards the camera with a serious expression. In the background, there is a brown wall and a piece of medical equipment with two black coiled cables.

“I’ll take an
exam table
over a hospital
bed any day.”

Sure, going to the doctor sounds like a drag. But diseases like high blood pressure and colon cancer are nothing to fool around with. So I go every year for my screenings. And then I can rest easy...in my own bed.

Live Like Your Life Depends On It.

